

ABOUT ED LONDERGAN

Ed Londergan is a Massachusetts author whose novels explore hope, redemption, reconciliation, family relationships and the resilience of the human spirit.

A lifelong Massachusetts resident, Londergan finds inspiration in memories, observations and the unexpected moments of everyday life - the overheard conversation, a chance encounter, a place or even a single expression that can set a story in motion.

He is the author of The Devil's Elbow, The Long Journey Home and Unlike Any Other.

His newest novel, A Thousand Miles from Home, explores the consequences of leaving the people we love, the difficulty of confronting the past and the possibility that even after years of mistakes and regrets, forgiveness and a second chance may still be possible.

When he isn't writing, Londergan enjoys reading, gardening, cooking and seeking out new experiences.

AUTHOR QUOTE

"A Thousand Miles from Home is ultimately a story about second chances. Sam has spent years running - from his past, his family and, in many ways, himself. His journey asks whether it is ever too late to stop running, make things right and find your way home."

WHY THIS STORY MATTERS

At its heart, the novel explores questions that extend beyond Sam Parker's journey: Can we escape our past? How do we forgive people who have hurt us? How do we ask forgiveness from those we've hurt? Can estranged families find their way back to one another? What does it really mean to belong somewhere? And is it ever too late for a second chance?
